Idiopathic pulmonary fibrosis (IPF) is a scarring disease of the lungs and the most common of the idiopathic interstitial pneumonias. The pathogenesis of IPF is characterized by the accumulation of myofibroblasts in the alveolar walls and honeycombed areas of the lungs, which leads to fibrosis. Activation of lung fibroblasts is one of the major factors responsible for the development and progression of IPF. Although the exact molecular mechanisms of this process are largely unknown, the recent progress in the identification of susceptibility genes for IPF has opened up new possibilities for understanding the pathogenesis of the disease One of the most important parts of marketing a franchise is creating a strong brand. In the case of The Late Show With David Letterman, the brand has become synonymous with "funny." This is not a good thing, if you ask CBS. A group of old-school Letterman staffers now working for CBS may try to change the brand's image by launching a new late-night talk show, aimed at younger audiences, CBS announced Wednesday. The new show will launch in April and replace the popular The Late Show With Stephen Colbert. CBS has had a rough start to 2017. Its flagship show, The Big Bang Theory, is in the midst of a disappointing third season. During the same period, it was nearly bought by Nexstar, a larger broadcast company, but then was sold back to CBS. As a result, The Late Show With Stephen Colbert is CBS' top-rated series and the network's biggest ratings draw. So, CBS is looking to change that with a new show featuring an older lineup. In a statement, the network's entertainment president Gary Levine said that the new show would aim to attract younger viewers. CBS announced that Trevor Noah, Larry Wilmore, Michael Che, and Hannibal Buress would be hosting the new show. All of the guests are writers and performers who are young enough to appeal to the younger audience 82157476af
